This work's completion hinged upon the thoughtful, dedicated efforts of many willing individuals. I owe a great debt to Dr. Ruth Wagoner, without whom this work and my penchant for evaluating opening statements would have never gotten off the ground. Readers Dr. Annette Powell and Dr. Evanthia Speliotis, through their thoughtful feedback and incisive interrogation of my work and its implications, each made invaluable contributions to this project. I frequently comment to non-Bellarmino friends and colleagues that I have been extremely fortunate to experience the highest caliber of academic instruction and mentorship during my time as an undergraduate student. These three professors represent the ultimate embodiment of that fact.

The subject of my rhetorical analysis, a number of trial transcripts containing opening statements, only made its way into my hands through the generosity of John Selent of Dinsmore & Shohl LLP and David Sexton of the Jefferson County Attorney's Office. Both gentlemen are proud alums of Bellarmine University, and I very much look forward to joining their ranks soon.

It must be noted that my passion for advocacy and trial procedure exists as a product of my participation in the Bellarmine Mock Trial Program. The coaches who have spent countless hours working with me from my first year in the program – Jim Wagoner, Thad Keal, Shamir Patel – deserve much credit for my development as a public speaker and aspiring attorney.

Finally, Dr. Jon Blandford, Director of the Bellarmine University Honors Program, provided encouragement and unbridled enthusiasm at every stage of the thesis process. His leadership of the program may most certainly be credited for the robust community of care and academic zeal that characterize our Honors Program. I find great privilege in the extent to which I have been fortunate enough to participate in this program with the equally stressed and surpassingly brilliant colleagues who make up its membership alongside me.
